assembles to see the production of a play only one act long as filled the Lyceum last night when "The Shades of Night" was put on as an afterpiece to "The Lash of a Whip." No doubt the gathering of fashion was largely the to the reappearance of Elsie de Wolfe, who had absented herself from the stage all season until last night. She was greeted with hearty applause when she entered. The play is familiar to few as its only American performance was at the Actors' Fund matinée two weeks ago. It was written by Capt. Robert Marshall and is in the unique vein of his longer pieces, the comedies of "A Royal Family" and "His Excellency the Governor." This new writer among the English dramatists devises rather commonplace plots, but expresses them in language original and in-

His odd phraseology, which creates laughter sometimes where no real humor exists, resembles only W. S. Gilbert of England and M. S. McLellan of America. This peculiar arrangement of words, but usual choice of plot is exemplified in "The Shades of Night." it is not uncommon in stage fiction to show
